WEATHER OF CONCERN

Weather of Concern

- Another warm and wet system will bring rain to Northern California starting Tuesday. Snow levels may initially start low (3500-5500 feet, north to south) on Tuesday but will gradually rise (5500-7500 feet, north to south) on Wednesday as warmer air moves in. Rainfall totals once again look impressive and minor street and small stream flooding will be of concern, especially for the Sierra.

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

The next storm system begins to spread in late Monday night into early Tuesday. This system will have a very wet plume of moisture, similar to the one which brought heavy precipitation today. While the exact timing and location have varied, confidence is improving in the potential for another wet event. The difference with this and the last system is there will be some cooler air ahead of this system which will allow somewhat lower snow levels, bringing the potential for significant snow impacts for mountain travel Tuesday into Wednesday. Snow levels are expected to rise to around pass levels late Tuesday night into Wednesday as warmer air advects in. Up to 1 to 2 feet of wet snow are possible at pass levels by Wednesday afternoon. Several inches of snow are possible down to around 5000 feet over the Northern Sierra, and down to 4000 feet over the mountains of western Plumas County and Lassen Park. A Winter Storm Watch is in effect from early Tuesday through Wednesday afternoon. Additional snow is also possible with another system on Thursday.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

A moist air mass over the area will bring drizzle or light showers to the area this morning. It will then be dry through Monday. Rain could return to the Central Coast Tuesday and the entire area late next week as a stronger low pressure system develops. Near or slightly below normal temperatures are expected through mid week.
